Koch Lecture, Larry Kinsella Discovery through Experimentation

After six decades of volunteering on salvage archaeology projects, I still get thrilled whenever I find something cool. I hope I never lose that ability! However, I had no idea that thrill could be found in experimental archaeology. The feeling is almost exactly the same, except the thrill is immediate with archaeological discoveries, while the experimental ones take a considerable amount of time. In this presentation, I hope to review some of my experimental projects in an effort to explain how and why they were undertaken in the first place. I've learned (from my wife) that a good story needs a beginning, a middle, and an end. It's the same with experimental archaeology, but the "discovery" can be made at any time during the project. I hope to explain more in this presentation.

Sunday Field Trip

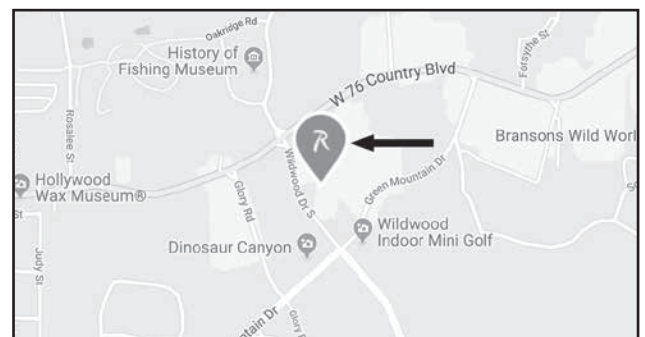

On Sunday morning, we will travel to the nearby Ancient Ozarks Natural History Museum. With galleries showcasing the American West and Civil War, and large collections of Native American artifacts and artwork, the Museum is sure to be enjoyed by all. Admission is $12. A description from the Museum website is below:

Featured items in the museum include a woolly mammoth, a saber toothed cat, giant ground sloth skeletons, and pre-historic cave bears. Through artifacts, images, text and video you'll learn about the Ozarks and the people and animals that lived here over 12,000 years ago up through the Civil War era. Nowhere else can outdoor enthusiasts, families and history buffs experience, in chronological order, the history of the Ozarks documented so thoroughly.
